S.] To think, suppose, or believe after consideration or deliberation; reckon. [< L. calculus, pebble.]

Syn.: account, compute, consider, count, deem, enumerate, estimate, number, rate, reckon, sum up. Number is the generic term. To count is to number one by one. To calculate is to use more complicated processes, as multiplication, etc. In the United States calculate is sometimes misused for intend, believe, think, suppose. Calculated should be used with care. With the meaning of adapted it is good English when the sense does not contradict the meaning adapted by calculation; as, the government policy was calculated to enslave the people, that is, expressly devised for that purpose. But it has often been used inconsistently by good writers in a way that contradicts such an interpretation; as, these are measures calculated to do harm when in fact the measures were devised to do good. Compute allows more of the element of probability, which is still more strongly expressed by estimate; as, to estimate the cost of a proposed building. To enumerate is to mention item by item; as, to enumerate one's grievances. To rate is to estimate by comparison, as if the object were one of a series. We count upon a desired future; we do not count upon the undesired. As applied to the present we reckon or count a thing precious or worthless. Compare ESTEEM. Prep.: on or upon.

This calendar is now 13 days behind the Gregorian calendar.—Hebrew c. See under HEBREW.—perpetual c., a calendar by which the day of the week in any given year may be ascertained during a widely extended period of time.

PERPETUAL CALENDAR.

To find the day of the week for any given date:

(1) Take the last two figures of the year, add ¼ of them, neglecting remainder. (2) Add for the month, if for Jan. or Oct., 1; May, 2: Aug., 3; Feb., Mar., or Nov., 4; June, 5; Sept. or Dec., 6; April or July, 0; if leap-year (that is, if it be divisible by 4 without remainder) Jan., 0; Feb., 3. (3) Add day of month. Divide the sum of these three by 7, and remainder gives the number of the day of the week. Thus:

What day of the week was August 28, 1911?

(1) 11+2 =13} 44 = 7 × 6 + 2 or second day of the week =
(2) August = 3 } Monday. This applies only to the 20th
(3) Date = 28 } century. For 19th century, add 2; for 21st century, add 6; 18th century, 4; but before 1752 the "old style" was used.—Republican c., the calendar of the first French Republic. See under REPUBLICAN.

calm, a. Free from disturbance or agitation. (1) Without motion; in repose. (2) Unmoved by passion or emotion; serene. [< Gr.LL+F kauma, heat of the sun.]

Syn.: collected, composed, cool, dispassionate, imperturbable, peaceful, placid, quiet, sedate, self-controlled, self-possessed, serene, smooth, still, tranquil, undisturbed, unruffled. That is calm which is free from disturbance or agitation; in the physical sense, free from violent motion or action; in the mental or spiritual realm, free from excited or disturbing emotion or passion. We speak of a calm sea, a placid lake, a serene sky, a still night, a quiet day, a quiet home. We speak, also, of "still waters," "smooth sailing," which are different modes of expressing freedom from manifest agitation. Cool, in this connection, always suggests the recognition of some form of danger or risk. One may be calm by assured superiority to danger, by ignorance of its existence or of its magnitude, or by indifference to the result, or by the apathy of hopelessness, as we speak of "the calmness of despair"; one is cool who, while intensely alive to danger or need, has all his faculties concentrated on the means of meeting or overcoming it; a calm boxer would probably be an easy victim, while a cool boxer would be a dangerous antagonist. Cool is stronger than composed or collected, which suggest some previous tendency to discomposure, and is more vigorous than self-controlled or self-possessed. One is composed who has subdued excited feeling; he is collected when he has every thought, feeling, or perception awake and at command. Tranquil refers to a present state, placid to a prevailing tendency. [< AS. cann, 1st and 3rd per. sing. of cunnan, know.]

Can always indicates some form of possibility. The colloquial use of can for may substitutes a moral for a physical possibility: "You can go" (without breach of duty since you have permission). May is, however, in this sense, at once more exact and more elegant. Can but and can not but are both correct, but differ in meaning. "I can not but go" means "I am irresistibly impelled or compelled to go"; "I can but go" means "I can only go," that is, "To go is all that is left me to do." Can but is thus by far the weaker expression. To cancel is, literally, to make a lattice by cross-lines, exactly our English cross out; to efface is to rub off, smooth away the face of, as of an inscription; to erase is to scratch out, commonly for the purpose of writing something else in the same space; to expunge is to punch out with some sharp instrument, so as to show that the words are no longer part of the writing; to obliterate is to cover over or remove, as a letter, as was done by reversing the Roman stylus, and rubbing out with the rounded end what had been written with the point on the waxen tablet. What has been canceled, erased, expunged, may perhaps still be traced; what is obliterated is gone forever, as if it had never been. Syn.: aboveboard, artless, fair, frank, guileless, honest, impartial, ingenuous, innocent, naïve, open, simple, sincere, straightforward, transparent, truthful, unbiased, unprejudiced, unreserved, unsophisticated. A candid statement is meant to be true to the real facts and just to all parties; a fair statement is really so. Fair is applied to the conduct as candid is not; as, fair treatment, "a fair field, and no favor." One who is frank has a fearless and unconstrained truthfulness. Honest and ingenuous unite in expressing contempt for deceit. On the other hand, artless, guileless, naïve, simple, and unsophisticated express the goodness which comes from want of the knowledge or thought of evil. As truth is not always agreeable or timely, candid and frank have often an objectionable sense; "to be candid with you," "to be perfectly frank," are regarded as sure preludes to something disagreeable. Sincere applies to the feelings, as being all that one's words would imply. Syn.: actor, agent, antecedent, author, causality, causation, condition, creator, designer, former, fountain, motive, occasion, origin, originator, power, precedent, reason, source, spring. The efficient cause, that which makes anything to be or be done, is the common meaning of the word, as in the saying "There is no effect without a cause." Every man instinctively recognizes himself acting through will as the cause of his own actions. The Creator is the Great First Cause of all things. A condition is something that necessarily precedes a result, but does not produce it. An antecedent simply precedes a result, with or without any agency in producing it; as, Monday is the invariable antecedent of Tuesday, but not the cause of it. The direct antonym of cause is effect, while that of antecedent is consequent. An occasion is some event which brings a cause into action at a particular moment; gravitation and heat are the causes of an avalanche; the steep incline of the mountain-side is a necessary condition, and the shout of the traveler may be the occasion of its fall. Causality is the doctrine or principle of causes, causation the action or working of causes. Motive is an impulse of an intelligent being which incites to action, and, if unchecked, is a cause of action. Compare DESIGN; REASON.—Ant.: consequence, creation, development, effect, end, event, fruit, issue, outcome, outgrowth, product, result.—Prep.: the cause of the disaster; cause for interference.

Syn.: apparent, diaphanous, distinct, evident, explicit, intelligible, limpid, lucid, manifest, obvious, pellucid, perspicuous. plain, straightforward, translucent, transparent, unadorned, unambiguous, unequivocal, unmistakable. A substance is said to be clear that offers no impediment to vision—is not dim, dark, or obscure; transparent, when objects are readily seen through it; we speak of a stream as clear when we think of the water itself: we speak of it as transparent with reference to the ease with which we see the pebbles at the bottom. Clear is also said of that which comes to the senses without dimness, dulness, obstruction, or obscurity; hence, the word is used for that which is free from any kind of obstruction; as, a clear field. Lucid and pellucid refer to a shining clearness, as of crystal. Translucent is less than transparent; a translucent body allows light to pass through, but may not permit forms and colors to be distinguished. Limpid refers to a liquid clearness, or that which suggests it; as, limpid streams. That which is distinct is well defined, as in outline, with nothing hazy, dim, or confused. That is plain which is, as it were, level to the thought, so that one goes straight on without difficulty or hindrance; as, plain language; a plain statement; a clear explanation. Perspicuous is often equivalent to plain, but plain never wholly loses the meaning of unadorned, so that we can say the style is perspicuous even if highly ornate, when we could not call it at once ornate and plain. Compare APPARENT; BLANK; EVIDENT; FINE; FREE; INNOCENT; MANIFEST; PLAIN; PURE; SURE; VIVID.—Ant.: ambiguous, cloudy, dim, dubious, foggy, indistinct, mysterious, obscure, opaque, turbid, unintelligible, vague.—clear'ly, adv.—clear'ness, n.

For this latter sense see CONSOLATION. See HAPPINESS; SATISFACTION; (verb) see CHERISH; CONSOLE.—Ant.: dearth, dreariness, gloom, misery, need, poverty, suffering, want, wretchedness.

We speak of competition in business, emulation in scholarship, rivalry in love, politics, etc.; emulation of excellence, success, achievement; competition for a prize; rivalry between persons or nations. Competition may be friendly, rivalry is commonly hostile. Opposition is becoming a frequent substitute for competition in business language: it implies that the competitor is an opponent and hinderer. It may have also a playful sense (often with to); as, one confesses to a weakness for confectionery. The chief present use of the word, however, is in the sense of making known to others one's own error or wrong-doing; as, to confess a crime. Acknowledge may be used as a milder word in this sense; as, I acknowledge my mistake; I acknowledge that the act was indefensible. But acknowledge is freely used of matters not involving error or fault; I acknowledge my signature; I acknowledge a friend's kindness, the receipt of a letter, a check, etc. Own is more informal than acknowledge and milder than confess. Own commonly indicates a somewhat reluctant acknowledgment. Admit and concede have a similar suggestion of reluctance or of possible objection. Syn.: black, dim, dismal, dusky, gloomy, murky, mysterious, obscure, opaque, sable, shadowy, shady, somber, swart, swarthy. Strictly, that which is black is absolutely destitute of color; that which is dark is absolutely destitute of light. In common speech, however, a coat is black, tho not optically colorless; the night is dark, tho the stars shine. That is obscure, shadowy, or shady from which the light is more or less cut off. Dusky is applied to objects which appear as if viewed in fading light; the word is often used, as are swart and swarthy, of the human skin when quite dark, or even verging toward black. Dim refers to imperfection of outline, from distance, darkness, mist, etc., or from some defect of vision. Opaque objects are impervious to light. Murky is said of that which is at once dark, obscure, and gloomy; as, a murky den; a murky sky. Figuratively, dark is emblematic of sadness, agreeing with somber, dismal, gloomy, also of moral evil; as, a dark deed. Of intellectual matters, dark is now rarely used in the old sense of a dark saying, etc. See MYSTERIOUS; OBSCURE. —Ant.: bright, brilliant, clear, crystalline, dazzling, gleaming, glowing, illumined, light, lucid, luminous, radiant, shining, transparent, white. Syn.: corrupt, decompose, molder, putrefy, rot, spoil. Rot is a strong word, ordinarily esteemed coarse, but on occasion capable of approved emphatic use; as, "the name of the wicked shall rot," Prov. x, 7.; decay and decompose are now common euphemisms. A substance is decomposed when resolved into its original elements by any process; it is decayed when resolved into its original elements by natural processes; it decays gradually, but may be instantly decomposed, as water into oxygen and hydrogen; to say that a thing is decayed may denote only a partial result, but to say it is decomposed ordinarily implies that the change is complete or nearly so. Putrefy and the adjectives putrid and putrescent, and the nouns putridity and putrescence, are used almost exclusively of animal matter in a state of decomposition, the more general word decay being used of either animal or vegetable substances. Decay may also be extended to any process of decline or breaking down, physical, mental, social, etc. See PUTREFY.—de-cay a-bl(eᴿ, a.—de-cayed′-ness, n.—de-cay′erᴿ, n. That which causes decay.

Syn.: craft, cunning, deceit, deceitfulness, delusion, dissimulation, double-dealing, duplicity, fabrication, falsehood, finesse, fraud, guile, hypocrisy, imposition, lie, lying, prevarication, trickery, untruth. Deceit is especially applied to the habit, deception to the act; guile applies to the disposition out of which deceit and deception grow, and also to their actual practise. A lie, lying, or falsehood, is the uttering of what one knows to be false with intent to deceive. The novel or drama is not a lie, because not meant to deceive; the ancient teaching that the earth was flat was not a lie, because not then known to be false. Untruth is more than lack of accuracy, implying always lack of veracity; but it is a somewhat milder and more dignified word than lie. Falsehood and lying are in utterance; deceit and deception may be merely in act or implication. Deception may be innocent, and even unintentional, as in the case of an optical illusion; deceit always involves injurious intent. Craft and cunning have not necessarily any moral quality; they are common traits of animals, but stand rather low in the human scale. Duplicity is the habitual speaking or acting with intent to appear to mean what one does not. Dissimulation is rather a concealing of what is than a pretense of what is not. Finesse is simply an adroit and delicate management of a matter for one's own side, not necessarily involving deceit. Compare ARTIFICE; FICTION; FRAUD; HYPOCRISY; LIE.—Ant.: candor, fair dealing, frankness, guilelessness, honesty, openness, simplicity, sincerity, truth, veracity.

Syn.: deceitful, delusive, illusive, illusory. Persons are deceitful; things are deceptive. We speak of a deceitful, but not of a deceptive man. We speak, however, of deceitful promises, as involving personal intent to deceive. It is more accurate to say deceptive than deceitful appearances. SYN.: aim, device, end, final cause, intent, intention, object, plan, project, proposal, purpose, scheme. Design refers to the adaptation of means to an end, the correspondence and coordination of parts, or of separate acts, to produce a result: intent and purpose overlaap all particulars, and fasten on the end itself. Intention is simply the more familiar form of the legal and philosophical intent. Plan relates to details of form, structure, and action, in themselves; design considers these same details all as a means to an end. The plan of a campaign may be for a series of sharp attacks, with the design of thus surprizing and overpowering the enemy. A man comes to a fixed intention to kill his enemy; he forms a plan to entrap him into his power, with the design of then compassing his death; as the law can not read the heart, it can only infer the intent from the evidences of design. Intent denotes a straining, stretching forth toward an object; purpose simply the placing it before oneself; hence, we speak of the purpose rather than the intent or intention of God. It is argued that the marks of design in nature prove it the work of a great Designer. Intention contemplates the possibility of failure; purpose looks to assured success; intent or intention refers especially to the state of mind of the actor; purpose to the result of the action. Compare AIM; CAUSE; END; IDEA; MODEL; PROJECT; PURPOSE; REASON.

SYN.: appetency, appetite, aspiration, concupiscence, coveting, craving, hankering, inclination, longing, proclivity, propensity, wish. Inclination is the mildest of these terms; it is a quiet, or even a vague or unconscious, tendency. Even when we speak of a strong or decided inclination we do not express the intensity of desire. Desire has a wide range, from the highest objects to the lowest; desire is for an object near at hand, or near in thought, and viewed as attainable; a wish may be for what is remote or uncertain; or even for what is recognized as impossible. Craving is stronger than hankering; hankering may be the result of a fitful and capricious appetite; craving may be the imperious and reasonable demand of the whole nature. Longing is a reaching out with deep and persistent demand for that which is viewed as now distant but at some time attainable; as, the captive's longing for release. Coveting ordinarily denotes wrong desire for that which is another's. A difference is in the things compared; a discrimination is in our judgment of them; a distinction is in our definition or description or mental image of them. Careful discrimination of real differences results in clear distinctions. Disparity is stronger than inequality, implying that one thing falls far below another; as, the disparity of our achievements when compared with our ideals. Dissimilarity is between things sharply contrasted; there may be a difference between those almost alike. There is a discrepancy in accounts that fail to balance. Variety involves more than two objects: so, in general, does diversity; variation is a difference in the condition or action of the same object at different times. Disagreement is not merely the lack, but the opposite, of agreement; it is a mild word for opposition and conflict: difference is sometimes used in the same sense. See REMAINDER.—Ant.: agreement, consonance, harmony, identity, likeness. resemblance, sameness, similarity, uniformity, unity.—Prep.: difference between the old and the new; differences among men; a difference in character; of action; of style; (less frequently) a difference (controversy) with a person; a difference of one thing from (incorrectly to) another.—difference tone (Psychol.), a third tone heard when two distinct tones are sounded together, its pitch being equal to the difference in vibration rate of the two primary tones.

Syn.: arduous, exhausting, hard, laborious, onerous, severe, toilsome, trying. Arduous (L. arduus, steep) signifies primarily so steep and lofty as to be difficult of ascent, and hence applies to that which involves great and sustained exertion and ordinarily for a lofty aim; great learning can only be won by arduous toil. Hard applies to anything that resists our endeavors as a scarcely penetrable mass resists our physical force. Anything is hard that involves tax and strain whether of the physical or mental powers. Difficult is not used of that which merely taxes physical force; a dead lift is called hard rather than difficult; breaking stone on the road would be called hard rather than difficult work; that is difficult which involves skill, sagacity, or address, with or without a considerable expenditure of physical force; a geometrical problem may be difficult to solve, a tangled skein to unravel; a mountain difficult to ascend. Hard may be active or passive; a thing may be hard to do or hard to bear. Arduous is always active. Syn.: affection, ailment, complaint, disorder, distemper, ill health, illness, indisposition, infirmity, malady, sickness, unhealthiness, unsoundness. Disease is the general term for any deviation from health; in a more limited sense it denotes some definite morbid condition; disorder and affection are rather partial and limited; as, a nervous affection; a disorder of the digestive system. Sickness was generally used in English speech and literature, till the close of the eighteenth century at least, for every form of physical disorder, as abundantly appears in the English Bible; "Elisha was fallen sick of his sickness whereof he died." 2 Kings xiii, 14. There is now, in England, a tendency to restrict the words sick and sickness to nausea, or "sickness at the stomach," and to hold ill and illness as the only proper words to use in a general sense. This distinction has received a limited acceptance in the United States, where sick and sickness have the earlier and wider usage. We speak of trifling ailments, a slight indisposition, a serious or a deadly disease; a slight or severe illness; a painful sickness or illness, a condition or state of ill health; an insidious, serious, severe, or deadly disease. Complaint is a popular term, which may be applied to any degree of ill health, slight or severe. Infirmity denotes a chronic or lingering weakness or disability, as blindness or lameness. Persons may contend either from mere ill will or self-interest, or from the highest motives; "that ye should earnestly contend for the faith which was once delivered to the saints," Jude 3.
